<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • The best part of this class wasn't that it was at 8am haha, but that it was a smaller class. Having only 8-10 people present, usually less, allowed for an intimate learning style that I did not receive in my other classes. Professor Duque was always on time, and always willing to walk us through difficult subject matters and ideas about nationalism. She clearly is learned and passionate about the subject, and what was more interesting was talking about current events. It was uncanny that the Ukraine War break out while in this class. I truly appreciated having a space to process what was going on in the world with my class mates and with our Professor. IF you're reading this professor have a great Summer! Thank you. • The lectures and discussions after reading the course material really helped for me to completely understand the material. • I enjoyed the use of PowerPoints and videos. The videos helped to put topics into perspective and show us real world examples of nationalism, conflict, and reconciliation. I also really enjoyed how the course was discussion-based. The professor helped facilitate an environment where students felt comfortable to share their opinions as well as personal experiences and relate that back to the topic that was being discussed that day. I enjoyed being able to hear my classmates's opinions on topics and maybe get a different perspective.

<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • The only thing I would say that could improve the experience of this course is to keep the same amount of readings, but also talk about current events every class. One of the things I loved about my INR course I took last semester was that every day we had to participate to get points. The best way to get those points out of the way was talking about the current events we read in the news before class that were in relation to an ongoing conflict. It encourage class cohesion and connection with the material. We (my classmates) became even passionate about the news and how our subject related to the current events, and my professor loved it. • N/A
